Robert Frost's "Stopping By Woods On Snowy Evening" is one of the most iconic poems in American literature. Written in 1922, the poem captures the beauty and stillness of a winter evening in the woods, and explores the speaker's complex emotions as he contemplates his own mortality.

The poem is written in four stanzas, each of which consists of five lines. The first stanza introduces the speaker, who is riding a horse-drawn sleigh through the woods on a snowy evening. The speaker is captivated by the beauty of the scene, and he stops his sleigh to admire the view.

In the second stanza, the speaker describes the woods in more detail. He notes the "dark and deep" trees, the "snow-laden branches," and the "little horse" that is pulling his sleigh. The speaker also hears the sound of "easy wind and downy flake," which creates a sense of peace and tranquility.

In the third stanza, the speaker begins to contemplate his own mortality. He wonders what will happen to him after he dies, and he reflects on the fact that he will eventually be forgotten. However, the speaker finds comfort in the beauty of the woods, which he believes will remain long after he is gone.

In the fourth and final stanza, the speaker bids farewell to the woods. He knows that he must continue on his journey, but he is grateful for the time he has spent in the woods. The speaker ends the poem with a sense of peace and acceptance.
